12/3 - 12/10

This past week, my work was focused mainly on the opportunity of my first in-person interview. My interview with Mr. LeVant was very intriguing and helpful because Mr. LeVant was able to explain certain aspects of his career in a detailed way and offer his opinions about certain things based on his own past experiences which have helped me understand the profession of consulting in a comprehensive way and acquire improved perspectives on certain facets of consulting

The experience of an in-person interview was very helpful in my development of soft skill because I was able to practice shaking hands with a professional, ask relevant questions during a conversation, and maintain a professional decorum in a business environment. One main point from the interview that stood out to me was the advice that maintaining contacts with clients and CEOs is a must in order to have a market for my services if splitting from my firm ever becomes a possibility. Another piece of information that captivated my attention was the advice of earning my master's degree first before entering the workforce. This information was very helpful to me because it clarified that by earning my master's I would be able to learn invaluable information and experience about consulting, which is very highly sought after by large firms when it comes to hiring.
